Introduction of New Faculty Member
Deah Miller, LMSW, LCAC

Deah Miller is an experienced advanced generalist social worker in Sedgwick County, receiving both her BSW and MSW degrees from Wichita State University. She has been an active social work practitioner throughout the community in the areas of substance abuse treatment, co-occurring mental health disorders, corrections, cultural competency in the administration of treatment and harm reduction. Her experiences in the provision of substance abuse treatment include case management, outpatient clinician, residential addictions therapist, and licensed clinical addictions counselor. With her advanced generalist social work knowledge, training and experience, she has been helping prepare social work students at BSW and MSW levels integrate into the local community to practice in all areas of social work. Deah has been an adjunct faculty member at Wichita State School of Social Work since 2009, teaching social work and addictions practice. As a regional advocate for generalist and advanced generalist social work education, Deah believes well-trained generalist social workers can provide vital services and support within the State of Kansas.

Deah is now teaching within the BSW and MSW Foundation programs for the School of Social Work. She will integrate her experience with current community practice in the classroom experience. Her continued research for evidence-based practice in service provision supports the need for professional generalist social workers across the state. She will advocate and recruit for extended community - university research collaboration to assist students to prepare for social work practice.

Deah has a strong interest in expanding the scope of social work practice. She firmly believes the generalist social work academic experience is the foundation for professional social work practice.

Deah can be contacted at deah.miller@wichita.edu. Her office is 505 Lindquist Hall. Please drop by and visit with Deah regarding your own ideas for ongoing issues in social work practice. Her office hours on the main campus this semester are Wednesdays & Thursdays from 1:00 - 3:00 pm.
Director’s Début
Brien Bolin
Director of the School of Social Work

As I begin my journey as the Director of the School of Social Work at Wichita State University, I reflect on the meaning of leadership. I consider the type of leader I would like to be. I think about directors in Schools of Social Work, I reflect on the directors in agencies which I have worked, and finally, I look to our political leaders. These are varied and provide both good and poor examples. As I continue to consider the type of leader that I would like to be, lectures of leadership styles echo in my mind. Am I an authoritarian leader, am I laissez-fair, or am I a democratic leader? I do not know, however what I do know is that to be effective, a leader needs to have many qualities.

Sitting at dinner tonight, a couple who appeared to be engaged were sitting near my table and meeting with a caterer. The soon-to-be-bride sat across the table from her future husband with her mom and dad by her side as they attempted to make decisions on the meal for the wedding reception. The caterer and chef were leading the discussion. The caterer seemed to be a seasoned veteran in the ways of engaged couples making decisions about what to serve their family and friends on their wedding day. What was observable was that the soon-to-be-bride was argumentative, contrary and unreceptive to the suggestions of the caterer. She did not like anything that was suggested by the caterer. She would not make decisions. Intrigued by this display of the mundane, I quickly realized that the caterer was guiding the couple with a limited set of options. She listed the choices for the main courses; salmon or chicken, steaks or fish, roast, etc. She then moved on to the sides; baby potatoes or asparagus, tossed salad or green beans, baby carrots, etc. The caterer made many suggestions as the family listened. In the end, the caterer lead the family. She directed from what she knew what foods people like. She knew “The wedding is not the marriage.” She kept the bigger picture in mind.

As I continued to reflect on leadership, I asked myself what type of leader I would like to be. The answer is always the same - I do not know. My actions will define my leadership, and if I keep the bigger picture in view, I will be ok.

Field Notes
Sabrina Perez Glatt & Shauna Millar
Director & Associate Director of Field Practicum

There was quite a change of intensity for placements this year. It was extremely reflective of the community at large in their struggle to provide the services to clients across the board, not just in one population service setting. These are varied and provide both good and poor examples. As I continue to consider the type of leader that I would like to be, lectures of leadership styles echo in my mind. Am I an authoritarian leader, am I laissez-fair, or am I a democratic leader? I do not know, however what I do know is that to be effective, a leader needs to have many qualities.

Practicum instructors will begin site visits in October and students are responsible for setting up those visits with you. Also, Mid-term Evaluations will be expected in October, again the responsibility of your students.

We will do Practicum Orientations the second week of November for the BSW/MSW students who are already in our program and are slated to begin Practicum for the 2012-2013 school year. If you are a placement agency / institution, you will be hearing from us after the end of this semester.

As always, on behalf of Shauna Millar and myself, we so appreciate your work and truly believe the WSU School of Social Work students will become the bright future for the profession of social work!
MSW Moment
Orren Dale
MSW Program Coordinator

Over the past summer, there have been a number of changes in the School of Social Work that are discussed elsewhere in this Newsletter. The general picture is positive. Linnea GlenMaye’s promotion is a confirmation of her good work, and indirectly an acknowledgement of the regard for social work within the university community. Brien Bolin is an able and well-grounded successor as program director. Our faculty is engaged. Enrollment is solid, and the incoming students are well motivated. The school faces a challenge as it prepares for reaffirmation of accreditation for both the BSW and MSW programs. This is the normal focus of newsletters like this.

On the local front, all seems to be going well. But it might be a good thing to take this transitional moment to consider the larger picture for social work, our community and our society. On the big stage, there lots of things blowin’ in the wind. I find myself asking, what kind of person is choosing to enter social work at this point in history?

Consider some of the recent auguries. Our excitement about the election of an African American thought to be the reincarnation of FDR has been dampened. The “Yes, we can!” of 2008 has become “No, we won’t” of 2011. Our nation keeps sending a dwindling pool of warriors to fight in small, distant wars. We put ribbons on our cars about supporting the troops, but we close hospitals and refuse small personal sacrifices like paying taxes to care for those who have borne the battle. Warriors from a former war live on the street and go untreated by a nation whose support is too often merely rhetorical.

The symbol of the United States as a nation of immigrants was once the Statue of Liberty, welcoming the teeming masses to a shining city on the hill. For many people, that America has been replaced by a nation with an electrified fence along the border, patrolled by vigilantes. We accept the illegal laborers, but banish them when their working days are done. Children born on American soil may soon be denied citizenship.

We see an America with historic numbers of our citizens in prison. We define the “drug problem” as one of interdiction, and focus on destroying the drugs instead of figuring out why so many of our people create the endless demand that fuels the drug cartels.

We confront an America where the gap between rich and poor is growing more rapidly than ever before. Average income goes up, yet one in six of our children lives in poverty. Our answer to the housing crisis is to save the institutions that profited, and to abandon those individuals who lost their homes. We subsidize the wealthy; maintain the financial institutions (“too big to fail!”) and the individuals are the victims.

We seem headed for a nation where a 10% unemployment rate is a structural reality. At the same time, we are bent on destroying those feeble programs we have created to support the needy. Social Security, the fabled third rail of politics, is now a Ponzi scheme.

Record numbers of our children fall victim to violence in their own homes. Violence against women is rampant, and families facing unemployment and loss of their homes turn on one another and descend into chaos. Our response to the failing American family is to propose a defense of marriage act.

We are entering a time when it seems that it is each against the other in society. Our loss of community shows in our fear of aliens, our mistrust of our institutions, and our inability to act to care for the helpless among us. We seem to have lost the ability to dialog, replaced by our rote recitation of our demands and beliefs. We scan the horizon for enemies, and we find them everywhere.

And yet, the year begins as a host of young people choose social work. They are not signing up for a New Deal, not entering a Great Society. It is not the cool thing. They are looking at a time when America is turning away from the tired, the poor and the elderly. They enter a society where the organized opposition wants to dismantle the social capital built by previous generations. Efforts to assist the needy are eroded by the fears and self interest of the well to do. And yet they come. It is enough to give an old man hope.

This year is filled with many changes in the School of Social Work. Dr. Glen Maye transfers to the Provost office; Dr. Brian Bolin is elected Director for the School of Social Work; Dr. Orren Dale assumes the position of MSW program director; and a new Dr. in town, Dr. Natalie Grant. We congratulate all of them and give them our support.

Then, there is the change of the Student Organization of Social Work (SOSW). The BSW and MSW students have combined to be in one organization. I believe this will give SOSW a much needed change in networking between both levels of students. I will be doing my best as President with much need support from Pam Oliver (Vice President) and Sherry Chapman (Faculty Advisor), thanks goes to both for all their help.

We are off to a great start this year. We started by participating in “Move in Day” on August 20th. During Convocation, we submitted an Activity Flag which several students helped in ideas for the design (see SOSW facebook page or Orgsync.com). On September 23rd we will participate in the “Veteran Homeless Stand Down” which we are doing a SOCK drive (Box located in the lobby of the West Campus).

The first few weeks of classes have brought us many new members. We now have 66 members of SOSW and it would be great to break 100 with the addition of our new MSW students. I know that we are all busy with classes, families, work, and/or practicum, and I know that no one can do everything. I would like to see each student commit to one SOSW activity this year and we will be able to succeed in helping our community in a way that will, not only benefit the community, but also benefit in learning to become the best social workers that we can.

I will be offering to the MSW students the next 3 weeks a limited offer to join SOSW for only $5.00. This is an offer Pam, Sherry and I offered the BSW students, and they took great advantage of it. With help from the MSW Faculty Advisor, Sabrina Perez Glatt, we will do our best to focus our events to those that would be beneficial to MSW students as well.

Within the next month I will be asking for nominations for the position of Secretary and Treasurer for SOSW, BSW and MSW students are encouraged to nominate each other.

Let us all have a great year, and GET INVOLVED!

Phi Alpha Honor Society - Beta Delta Chapter - MSW Members
Maggie Green, President

For the year of 2011-2012, Phi Alpha plans to provide a year of service to our metropolitan community. For the fall 2011 semester, Phi Alpha will be conducting a volunteer project which entails distributing hygiene bags to three homeless agency locations in the Wichita area. Phi Alpha would like to thank student volunteers that will be participating in the volunteer project as well as contributors for the hygiene contents which will provide services to over 400 homeless individuals in Wichita.

Phi Alpha will also be submitting a poster board presentation of the proposed hygiene bag project to the Council on Social Work Education national conference in Atlanta, GA October 27-30.

The year ahead looks promising in implementing Phi Alpha’s purposes of providing a closer bond among social work students and promoting humanitarian goals and idea.
Horses Participate in Recovery

Theresa Flaigle didn’t have horses as a child, but she loved them so much she’d do anything to be with them. She’d take a bus to the stables, where she cleaned stalls and did other odd jobs. Her home life was dysfunctional, but she didn’t realize at the time that “Those horses were saving me from that home. … I understand how powerful they can be.”

Today, Flaigle divides her work between traditional psychotherapy and equine-assisted therapy. Flaigle said that just like art, music or play therapy, treatment should be directed by “whatever therapeutic tool” best meets the clients’ needs, and for some people the best tool is equine therapy.

“If a horse follows you - if no one likes you - that’s empowering,” she said.

Flaigle is certified by EAGALA (Equine Assisted Growth and Learning Association). Of the 3,500 EAGALA members worldwide, just a handful are in Kansas. EAGALA requires that a licensed mental health provider pair up with an equine specialist, whose job it is to interpret the horses’ behavior.

Flaigle works with a pool of privately owned horses boarded at the stable she uses southeast of Wichita. Owners sign waivers and, Flaigle has found, are glad their horses are being engaged in the program. The equine specialist she works with chooses which horses are good matches for particular clients. Several of the horses belong to the stable’s owner. One is owned by equine specialist Kathleen Timmermans.

Equine-assisted therapy is focused on solving problems and finding solutions. Clients are asked to use the props in the arena to complete tasks, then Flaigle, often conferring with Timmermans, observes them to see what they’ve done with the props and how they interact with the horses. Is the horse in charge or is the client?

“We don’t want to make our clients’ interpretations for them,” Flaigle said. “We offer them a question and let them interpret.”

Teresia DuBois, who will also be today’s guinea pig, says that for all of talk therapy’s benefits, it also has shortcomings: “Kids in the system know what to say.” DuBois works in crisis intervention at COMCARE of Sedgwick County and also as a school social worker.

But in the ring, circumstances aren’t predictable, and Flaigle can often help her clients understand greater insight.

They do individual sessions but also work with groups of up to 10 people. Breakthrough Club in Wichita comes twice a month for team-building exercises. Breakthrough is a clubhouse open to anyone who’s ever been diagnosed with a mental illness.

Lessons learned in the ring translate to real life. When a horse misbehaves and is taken back to its stall, young clients see the parallel to their own lives. And the horses mirror back the people’s behaviors, whether calm or excited. Making those comparisons to life outside the ring can be easier for clients than if they were working on their problems in a traditional environment.

“You can own something better when someone’s not saying ‘you, you, you,’” Timmermans said.

She shares one of her favorite success stories about a woman who learned to assert herself and say “no.” Working with horses gave her that confidence.

“These are valuable teachers,” Flaigle said.

“They don’t judge.”

Role-playing

Today, the role of the client will be played by DuBois. Her character is a 50-year-old empty nester whose cheating husband just left her.

Though DuBois is playing a character, all three women point out it’s difficult not to bring aspects of your own life into this situation.

Flaigle asks DuBois to use the props in the arena to build two spaces: A representation of her house five years ago and another of her home now. DuBois mulls her options: traffic cones, cardboard tubes, swimming pool noodles, hula hoops, several poles and miscellaneous items.

She builds her old home, an orderly arrangement. DuBois says she’s assigned meaning to the props that make up that home. “Each one of those things means something,” she said. For example, the hula hoops represent her and her ex-husband. When one of the horses approaches the home, she becomes anxious. Later, she says she was concerned the horse might knock down the foundation of her former home. But, she says, “I guess it wasn’t as perfect as I though it was.”

Nearby, her new home is in shambles. The props are tossed in a pile. She says she chose the muddiest, roughest part of the arena as the spot for her new home. Pointing to that corner of the arena, she says, “That piece of s--t over there is my life now.”

As DuBois shares these revelations with Flaigle and Timmermans, it’s clear she isn’t pander- ing to the new observer who’s taking notes. At least to some degree, these are insights she’s made about both her character and herself.

Flaigle instructs DuBois to bring the horse of her choice to the new house without the use of a halter or bridle. When DuBois picks the horse she wants, he is resistant to go to her new house.

“See, he doesn’t want to go.” She interprets his behavior as meaning non of the horses want to go to her new home. “I don’t want to go.”

When two of the horses wander to DuBois’ old house, she sees this as further proof the horses don’t want to visit her new house.

No one can predict what will happen in the arena. “If you have an expectation for an outcome, you’re gonna get slapped in the face” Flaigle said.

“A metaphor is a metaphor, no matter what it is,” adds Timmermans. “I cannot facilitate this ending.”

DuBois is instructed to bring something representative of what she wants her house to be like now. As she works on the structure, she says “I don’t have to fill it with all of the garbage.”

Eventually, horses begin to wander her way.

“I’m changing my house, and now they’re coming” she said, happiness evident in her voice. “There are things about my old life I liked, (but) I don’t want my new house to be exactly the same. I’m responsible for creating my new house.”

DuBois takes this to mean there are things about her life she my need to change before people will once again want to come into her home and her life.

Flaigle said equine-assisted sessions generally last an hour, but she tries to always find a peak moment of insight at which to wrap up, ending things on a poignant note.

Reality U: Reality U is an exercise that helps youth understand the “realities” involved in preparing for an employable future and adult responsibilities. Each student completes a lifestyle assessment and is assigned an occupation based on their grade point average. Students are given a checkbook with a monthly salary to go through the Reality U and purchase housing, transportation, child care, food, utilities, insurance and more. Community representatives from those entities are stationed at booths in the Reality U. Volunteers are needed to assist students with their purchases. Contact Diane Graham at dgraham@ciswichita.org if you would like to volunteer for an upcoming Reality U.

Mentor: Have lunch with a child once a week. Quality time in this one-on-one relationship can help students in many areas that affect life at home and at school. By offering friendship, guidance and a positive perspective, a mentor clearly shows that someone cares.
