Although Flack limited the kinds of objects she depicted in her early work, she sometimes might have been alluding to the social and political unrest of the 1960s. At this time, the viewer might interpret her focus on cosmetics as an early feminist criticism of the demands upon women to enhance their appearance. Furthermore, by including both light foundation and coarse washing powder for black hair, Flack was perhaps indirectly acknowledging racial tension and the struggle against racial discrimination. Her attention to the shiny caps of Cover Girl foundation-makeup jars and to the gold lipstick tube hints at the precision with which she later depicted light reflections captured in photographs. Here, the neat arrangement of objects, crowded together, an occupational concern with cleaning objects together, the compositional approach, and the color range of the painting on a small canvas, cover girl, 1962, lend the painting a temporary quality. These same objects, as well as photographs, cosmetics, and other personal and contemporary memorabilia appear in Flack’s typically large, boldly colored works.

Although Flack limited the kinds of objects she depicted in her early work, she sometimes might have been alluding to the social and political unrest of the 1960s. At this time, the viewer might interpret her focus on cosmetics as an early feminist criticism of the demands upon women to enhance their appearance. Furthermore, by including both light foundation and coarse washing powder for black hair, Flack was perhaps indirectly acknowledging racial tension and the struggle against racial discrimination. Her attention to the shiny caps of Cover Girl foundation-makeup jars and to the gold lipstick tube hints at the precision with which she later depicted light reflections captured in photographs. Here, the neat arrangement of objects, crowded together, an occupational concern with cleaning objects together, the compositional approach, and the color range of the painting on a small canvas, cover girl, 1962, lend the painting a temporary quality. These same objects, as well as photographs, cosmetics, and other personal and contemporary memorabilia appear in Flack’s typically large, boldly colored works.

Although Flack limited the kinds of objects she depicted in her early work, she sometimes might have been alluding to the social and political unrest of the 1960s. At this time, the viewer might interpret her focus on cosmetics as an early feminist criticism of the demands upon women to enhance their appearance. Furthermore, by including both light foundation and coarse washing powder for black hair, Flack was perhaps indirectly acknowledging racial tension and the struggle against racial discrimination. Her attention to the shiny caps of Cover Girl foundation-makeup jars and to the gold lipstick tube hints at the precision with which she later depicted light reflections captured in photographs. Here, the neat arrangement of objects, crowded together, an occupational concern with cleaning objects together, the compositional approach, and the color range of the painting on a small canvas, cover girl, 1962, lend the painting a temporary quality. These same objects, as well as photographs, cosmetics, and other personal and contemporary memorabilia appear in Flack’s typically large, boldly colored works.

Although Flack limited the kinds of objects she depicted in her early work, she sometimes might have been alluding to the social and political unrest of the 1960s. At this time, the viewer might interpret her focus on cosmetics as an early feminist criticism of the demands upon women to enhance their appearance. Furthermore, by including both light foundation and coarse washing powder for black hair, Flack was perhaps indirectly acknowledging racial tension and the struggle against racial discrimination. Her attention to the shiny caps of Cover Girl foundation-makeup jars and to the gold lipstick tube hints at the precision with which she later depicted light reflections captured in photographs. Here, the neat arrangement of objects, crowded together, an occupational concern with cleaning objects together, the compositional approach, and the color range of the painting on a small canvas, cover girl, 1962, lend the painting a temporary quality. These same objects, as well as photographs, cosmetics, and other personal and contemporary memorabilia appear in Flack’s typically large, boldly colored works.

Although Flack limited the kinds of objects she depicted in her early work, she sometimes might have been alluding to the social and political unrest of the 1960s. At this time, the viewer might interpret her focus on cosmetics as an early feminist criticism of the demands upon women to enhance their appearance. Furthermore, by including both light foundation and coarse washing powder for black hair, Flack was perhaps indirectly acknowledging racial tension and the struggle against racial discrimination. Her attention to the shiny caps of Cover Girl foundation-makeup jars and to the gold lipstick tube hints at the precision with which she later depicted light reflections captured in photographs. Here, the neat arrangement of objects, crowded together, an occupational concern with cleaning objects together, the compositional approach, and the color range of the painting on a small canvas, cover girl, 1962, lend the painting a temporary quality. These same objects, as well as photographs, cosmetics, and other personal and contemporary memorabilia appear in Flack’s typically large, boldly colored works.

Art of Our Time

Selections from the Ulrich Museum of Art
Wichita State University

Patricia McDonnell and Emily Stamey

With contributions by Toby Kamps, Laura Moriarty,
Antonya Nelson, Timothy R. Rodgers, and Robert Silberman

Photo-essay by Larry Schwarm

Ulrich Museum of Art | Wichita State University in association with the University of Washington Press
Toby Kamps is senior curator at the Contemporary Arts Museum, Houston. He has organized exhibitions on the work of Vanessa Beecroft, Ellsworth Kelly, and Claes Oldenburg as well as such themed exhibitions as Small World: Dioramas in Contemporary Art (2000), Lateral Thinking: The Art of the 1990s (2002), and The Old, Weird America (2008).

Patricia McDonnell is director of the Ulrich Museum of Art. Her scholarly focus is upon European and American modernism, and she is a leading specialist on the painter Marsden Hartley. Her publications include Marsden Hartley: American Modern (1997), On the Edge of Your Seat: Popular Theater and Film in Early Twentieth-Century American Art (2002), and Painting Berlin Stories (2003).

Laura Moriarty is the author of three novels and the recipient of several literary awards. Before becoming a full-time writer, she was a social worker. Moriarty lives in Lawrence, Kansas, where she teaches creative writing at the University of Kansas.

Antonya Nelson has written three novels and published six short-story collections. She contributes often to the New Yorker and the New York Times Book Review. Nelson holds the Cullen Chair in Creative Writing at the University of Houston. Her award-winning novel, Living to Tell (2008), takes place in her hometown of Wichita, and her forthcoming novel, Bound, is set there as well.

Timothy R. Rodgers is director of the Scottsdale (Arizona) Museum of Contemporary Art. Formerly chief curator at the New Mexico Museum of Art, Santa Fe, he is involved in a range of writing and curatorial projects. His scholarly concentration is on American early modernism.

Robert Silberman is an associate professor of art history at the University of Minnesota’s Twin Cities campus. His chief scholarly interests have been photography, film, and contemporary art. Silberman collaborated with former New York Times photography critic Vicky Goldberg on the companion volume for the 1999 PBS series American Photography: A Century of Images.

Larry Schwarm is a professor of art at Emporia State University, Emporia, Kansas, and a nationally regarded photographer whose work has been shown at the Art Institute of Chicago and the Smithsonian American Art Museum, Washington, D.C. His 2003 book, On Fire: Larry Schwarm, won the Honickman Book Award and Prize.

Ulrich Museum of Art
Advisory Board, 2009–10

Carol Wilson, Chair
Joan S. Beren, Vice Chair
Martin Bauer
Kelly Callen
Ronald Christ
J. Eric Engstrom
Dr. Alan Fearey
Sonia Geterman
Edward Hraly
Lou Heilman
Trish Higgins
Jacque Kouri
Dr. George Lucas
Nancy Martin
Mike Michaelis
Jane C. McHugh
Chris F. Paulsen-Polk
Bruce Schreck
Shoko Kato Sevart
Chris Shank
Dwayne Shannon
Ann Townsend

Ex-Officio
Ted D. Ayres
Dr. Elizabeth King
John More
Dr. Patricia McDonnell
Dr. Gary C. Miller
Dr. Rodney Miller
Dr. Martha Shawver

Ulrich Museum of Art Staff

Linda Dell, Assistant Director of Finance and Management
Aimee Geist, Curator of Education
Dr. Patricia McDonnell, Administrator Specialist
Dr. Patricia McDonnell, Director
Kevin Mullins, Curator of Exhibitions
Dr. Emily Stamey, Curator of Modern and Contemporary Art
Teresa Veazey, Public Relations Manager

Advisory Board and Staff